Next steps

Based on your results, there are a number of things to consider moving forward. One may be to take the items or program categories that your location scored highest on (your green items), and attempt to replicate these practices at other locations within your organization. Your lowest-scoring items (in red) or program categories need to be addressed in a timely fashion and reassessed at a later date. For specific help on these items, visit nsc.org/journey/tools [exact URL will be forwarded when available] and see “Next Steps”.

If you performed this self-assessment as an individual, you may also choose to convene a small group of employees and supervisors (or a safety committee) to help you understand both the entire scope of the problem as well as the potential solutions or ideas for enhancement. Oftentimes, some of the best ideas come from employees that do the work with the added benefit of increased adoption of the implemented solutions. For more on engaging others in safety visit nsc.org/journey/guidebooks [exact URL will be forwarded when available] and see “Leadership and Engagement”.
